Proposal for nursing undergraduate curriculum change

2. BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF PROPOSAL:

Based on feedback from student focus groups and from extensive faculty consideration, the nursing department wants to rearrange content in 4 courses to enhance clinical application of material being taught in the classroom. Re: Proposal for nursing undergraduate curriculum changes

Date: February 14, 2003

Currently, a nursing major takes 4 semesters of upper division nursing courses. Most courses have a classroom and a clinical component. The best scenario occurs when the classroom content is closely matched with the clinical experience, so that material can be immediately and directly applied. Of course, there are many other considerations when planning a curriculum and for many years we have been teaching a curriculum to our junior students that had them taking a course called The Childbearing Family and Women's Health in the first semester of their junior year but having clinical experience in the area of Obstetrics in the second semester of the junior year.

Two years ago, the department's curriculum committee instituted focus groups as a method of evaluating the curriculum. One of the primary areas identified by students as needing improvement was the situation described above. The curriculum committee and eventually the entire undergraduate faculty spent two years figuring out a way to re-order content in a logical and pedagogically sound way to incorporate the desired change. We undertook the examination of all components of the nursing curriculum and slowly built a new and improved version. The attached grid depicts the current curriculum on the top half of the page and the proposed curriculum on the bottom half.

The proposed change involves moving content around in four courses. We have given new names and numbers to these courses but the course descriptions and objectives are unchanged, just in new places. We are in the process of writing new course registration forms for the Office of Registration and Records.
