

Television and Movies During the Age of Covid

During the time of the Coronavirus Pandemic, people have grown accustomed to watching shows and films from streaming services.

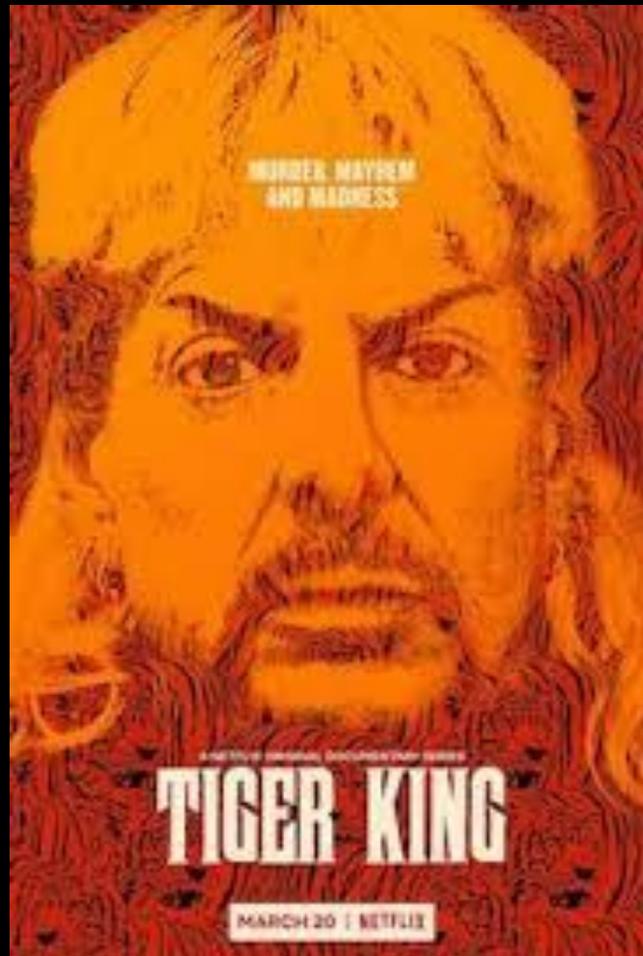

Because of the pandemic, movies and premieres have been shut down, and most films that were supposed to be released in 2020 were delayed to 2021.

Here are some films and shows that people have watched during their quarantine.

Tiger King

The miniseries Tiger King was released to Netflix on March 20, 2020. This was right at the beginning of the Pandemic. The show received millions of views as a result of lockdowns across the world. Memes also surfaced on social media featuring the show's star Joe Exotic and Carol Baskin, both working in the animal industry. The show is prime reality show drama, and if you like reality shows, you will like Tiger King.

Ozark

Ozark season 3 was released March 27, 2020. The show's popularity made this the top show streamed during the height of quarantine. Critics also call the third season it's best season yet.

Extraction

Extraction was released April 24, 2020. The show follows a boy and a mercenary as they fight to be rescued. The film was seen by over 99 million people in the first month of the film's release.

Films and shows from streaming services make it quick, easy, and convenient for people who want to watch. You can pause it where you want, when you want, and you never have to leave your house. During the Pandemic, people confided in movies and shows to provide a sense of escapism.

This attributes to the rise of streaming services, along with Netflix, Hulu, Disney+, and Amazon Prime to begin to make more money than other movie studios who release films to theaters.

During lockdown, I myself decided to watch more shows by watching an episode or two a day of a specific show or watch a movie. I wanted to broaden my horizons and watch new films that I might not watch on a normal basis.
