BUZZING WITH THE HORNET

The contributors take over--

From Harold Hickey

"In the future it may be possible to fashion the learning environment to match the motives of the individual student; not just to make him happy, but to make better use of his own intellectual ability to learn and thus to derive the primary benefits of a college education," to quote from the Center for Research on Learning and Teaching at the University of Michigan.

Do you know your students' motives for learning? Can such knowledge help in the instructional process? Can such awareness reflect itself in what you do in the classroom?

If you would like to come to grips with questions such as these in a frank and professional exchange with other junior college teachers, why not consider attending the annual conference on The Nature and Demands of Two-Year College Teaching? See September issue of AAJC Journal in our library for the report of last June's conference

Three members of our faculty attended last June and agree that it is an exciting experience--a conference that is really different and one that comes to grips with the problems of TEACHING IN THE CLASSROOM discussed by those involved in the process.
